An exhibition of 80 historical maps shows not just the evolution of Chinese cartography, but also how our understanding of the past informs political questions in the present.

The maps were drawn like Chinese paintings, depicting rivers and mountains.

The exhibition features a chart showing the land of China. It clearly shows how China’s territorial claims have evolved over time, reflecting historical events and political changes.

It can be helpful to examine how [China] saw the world and how they mapped it.

In many ways, China has been projecting maps in the East Asia region for centuries. This exhibition provides a unique perspective on how China has viewed its neighbors and the world around it.

The exhibition is a fascinating look at how maps can tell us about the past and how they can influence our understanding of the present.
